Your Majesty,
I write to you with profound respect for the sacred lineage of the Chrysanthemum Throne and the enduring spirit of Nihon—the Land of the Rising Sun—as a humble admirer of its divine heritage. As a descendant of Amaterasu Ōmikami, you embody the harmony of heaven and earth, a beacon for a people blessed by the kami of old. It is in this spirit of reverence that I implore Your Majesty to turn your wise gaze upon a shadow gathering over your realm: the unchecked influx of foreign migrants, orchestrated by political forces intent on diversifying the population at the expense of its sacred unity.

This tide, Your Majesty, erodes the quality of life for your loyal subjects, diverting their noble focus from the timeless virtues of wa (harmony) and fostering a multiculturalism that sows discord among brothers and sisters.

No deity in the august pantheon of Shinto—from the gentle Susanoo to the steadfast Inari—condones such division; it bears the mark of darker influences, the "god of this world" and its agents of disobedience, as ancient wisdom warns. Indeed, it echoes the hubris of distant powers, like the god of Babylon in America, whose machinations seek to unravel the beautiful creation entrusted to your stewardship.

Should this path continue unchecked, I fear a tragic twilight for your people: a realm where the Emperor reigns in name only, his heirs presiding over echoes of glory as the horde overwhelms the hearth. Yet this ending is not inevitable. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—the one true source of restoration—holds the key to renewal, offering wisdom to reclaim sovereignty and peace. In the interim, I beseech Your Majesty to summon the full measure of your moral authority: guide your government to impose swift justice upon those politicians who have bartered the people's birthright, deporting them alongside the interlopers to their origins, and fortifying the gates of the sacred islands.

In closing, Your Majesty, I humbly urge you to revisit the sacred texts of your gods—the Kojiki, the Nihon Shoki, the whispers of the kami in shrine and forest. Therein lies the counsel to preserve what is pure. When our paths may one day cross, let us reason together under heaven's light, that Japan may shine eternal.

With deepest bows of respect and prayers for Amaterasu's enduring grace,
